Chapter 455: The Mortal Boundaries of the Dimensional Towers

The New Limits of Mortal Achievement

In the vast cosmos governed by the Divine Triad, Sung Jin-Woo's monumental structures—the Dimensional Towers—once stood as boundless arenas where mortals could challenge their limits, gain unparalleled strength, and rise to unimaginable heights.

However, with the Divine Triad's decree bringing mortality back to existence, profound changes swept through these legendary towers.

No mortal, regardless of strength or status, could now ascend past Floor 100. The remaining 900 floors, previously accessible only to the most formidable beings, were permanently sealed off. The mystical energies that once invited adventurers beyond the hundredth floor faded into impenetrable barriers infused with Sung Jin-Woo’s overwhelming authority.

The announcement reverberated across the multiverse, sparking awe, confusion, and contemplation among the realms’ inhabitants.

"Only those destined for divinity and eternal service to the Triad shall step beyond the mortal threshold."

The Gradual Decline of Dimensional Gates and Dungeons

The consequences of this decree extended beyond the towers. The once omnipresent dimensional gates and dungeons, which served as the primary sources of challenges and threats, began to fade from existence.

What was once a chaotic cycle of dungeon breaks, monster invasions, and heroic battles gave way to a more stable and harmonious order. The number of dimensional gates decreased significantly, and the intensity of the monsters spawning within the remaining ones gradually weakened.

Creatures that once brought terror to entire civilizations dwindled in both numbers and strength. The multiverse, once rife with the echoes of endless battles, grew quieter, its rhythm shifting toward peace and prosperity.

The Cycle of Life Restored

With mortality reinstated and the dangers of the past subdued, the natural cycle of life flourished anew.

The maximum lifespan for mortals became 200 years, a generous extension compared to their earlier lives.

The average lifespan now ranged between 80 to 120 years, depending on one's circumstances and physical condition.

Communities adapted to this new reality, focusing more on building lasting legacies rather than chasing eternal life. Families thrived, children were nurtured, and wisdom was passed down through generations.

The drive to achieve greatness was no longer fueled by the pursuit of immortality but by the desire to live a meaningful, finite existence.

A New Era of Balanced Strength

As the challenges presented by the towers and dungeons diminished, so too did the need for mortals to wield overwhelming power. Warriors, mages, and adventurers still trained diligently, but their purpose shifted from sheer survival to safeguarding peace and fostering prosperity.

The strongest mortal beings became guardians of their respective realms, their power capped at levels attainable only through Floor 100 of the Dimensional Towers. Beyond that, no mortal was permitted to ascend.

The era of unchecked ambition and endless battles had given way to an era of responsibility, harmony, and measured growth.

Sung Jin-Woo's Vision

From his throne in the Godverse, Sung Jin-Woo observed the unfolding changes with satisfaction. His decree had restored balance to creation, preventing stagnation while fostering growth and purpose among the multiverse's inhabitants.

"They will thrive, not because of endless battles, but because they now understand the value of time, family, and legacy," he remarked to Ashborn and Sung Su-Ho.

Ashborn agreed, his celestial eyes shining with wisdom. "Mortality is their greatest teacher."

Sung Su-Ho nodded with a smile. "And with their finite existence, they will cherish every moment."

A New Chapter Begins

The multiverse, once shaped by chaos and ambition, entered a golden era of peace and enlightenment. Mortals embraced their roles as stewards of creation, building civilizations that honored the legacy of the Divine Triad.

Though they could no longer reach the highest heights of the Dimensional Towers, they found fulfillment in living lives filled with purpose, love, and redemption.

And so, under the watchful eyes of Sung Jin-Woo and the Divine Triad, the cycle of life continued—strong, vibrant, and harmonious.
